EDWARD QUINN: A NOTABLE HAURAKI MINE MANAGER

Philip Hart
EDWARD QUINN: A NOTABLE HAURAKI MINE MANAGER

Abstract: The son of a miner, Edward Quinn joined his father on the new Thames field when aged 17. As well as acquiring interests in several claims there and at Ohinemuri, his increasing skills meant he soon became a manager. Involved in the Te Aroha rush and then in the Waiorongomai and Tui portions of that field, he managed several mines there. At Tui, despite not working his own ground he would try to obtain others’ unworked ground, but failed. At Karangahake he again attempted to exploit the system of holding ground for his own benefit, unsuccessfully.

Quinn mined on almost every Hauraki field, prospected briefly in the King Country, and even became a mine manager at Reefton. In addition, for a while he ran several hotels and also took up contracts to construct roads and drain swamps. He also acquired farmland, and may have farmed it.

Notable for his involvement in the local community, he was a member of two licensing committees, the Hot Springs Domain Board at Te Aroha, the Te Aroha Town Board, and the Ohinemuri County Council. Relations with his colleagues were often fraught, as he never failed to speak his mind about others’ defects. He suffered from miners’ complaint for many years, possibly increasing his irascibility.

HIS FATHER

Edward Quinn,1 commonly known as Ned,2 was the son of another miner, Thomas,3 and Mary Naughton or Norton.4 His father, described as ‘an old Californian digger’, joined that rush in 1852, remaining there for five years and ‘being very successful’ before arriving in Auckland in 1862.5 After fighting in the Waikato War, in July 1865 he was granted a license for the Swan Inn, Mechanic's Bay, Auckland.\textsuperscript{6} As this was unprofitable, by the following October he was bankrupt.\textsuperscript{7}

He was one of the pioneers of the Thames goldfields, and took out the second miner’s right there. He discovered the first reef in Tapu Creek, the Quinn and Cashell’s.\textsuperscript{8} Mr Quinn experienced all the ups and downs of digging life, and was much respected at the Thames, where he was well known.\textsuperscript{9}

Another obituary, whilst agreeing that he had the second miner’s right, stated that Quinn and Cashell’s claim was the second reef to be found at Tapu.\textsuperscript{10} In fact, he had the third miner’s right, as his son correctly recalled in 1923.\textsuperscript{11} He had been on the first steamer to the new field and had the first sluicing dam in Karaka Creek, ‘for it was alluvial gold only that the Thames pioneers were looking for in the first instance’.\textsuperscript{12} A working partner in several early claims, he was described in April 1868 as ‘indefatigable’ in trying to find gold.\textsuperscript{13}

One of the original prospectors of Ohinemuri, he owned the first mine at Waitekauri.\textsuperscript{14} None of this hard work brought financial security; in 1876, for instance, despite selling land to meet debts and feed his family he was unable to pay a judgment summons for £4 13s 3d, having not ‘a penny in my pocket’.15 Having acquired an Ohinemuri agricultural lease in 1875 at what would become Waikino, he immediately started farming it.16 He participated in the Te Aroha rush, pegging out three men’s ground adjacent to the Prospectors’ Claim and being an owner of the No. 1 South and a shareholder in the subsequent company.17 Like his son, he had one share in the Auckland, registered in early December 1880 but declared abandoned five months later.18

In the 1880s, he abandoned mining to farm at Tarariki Creek, near Paeroa,19 and contracted to make roads and drains.20 That he continued to have financial difficulties was illustrated by his application, in 1893, for either a ‘gift of land somewhere near where I am living at Paeroa’ as a reward for fighting in the Auckland Militia throughout the Waikato War. Then a married man with five children, he had ‘left a situation of 8/- a day to join the Army’. If a land grant was not possible, ‘I will be only too glad to receive money instead’. His application was unsuccessful.21 He explained his financial position when applying, successfully, for the old age pension in

EARLY LIFE AT THAMES

Edward Quinn, born in Galway, Ireland, in 1851, arrived in Auckland in June 1865 on the ‘Balaclava’ with his mother, three sisters, and two brothers, three years after his father.\(^ {26}\) His reminiscences, recorded in 1923, explained his going to Thames in September 1867 as ‘the result of an adventure of boyish enterprise. As a matter of fact he ran away at the age of 16 from an apprenticeship which he was serving in Auckland to the plastering trade, to seek his fortune on the newly opened goldfield’. His father was already working his sluicing claim when Quinn arrived ‘closely upon the paternal heels, but without the paternal permission. He sought and surprised his father on arrival, received pardon for his escapade, and was soon working in a family partnership’.\(^ {27}\) He took out his first miner’s right on 1 November, transferring it from Karaka to Tapu, then known as Waikawau, two months later.\(^ {28}\) As he explained in 1923, as he and his father had worked ‘without achieving any notable reward’ at Thames, they went to Tapu and ‘took to reefing, and struck a patch in what was known as

Quinn and Cashell’s claim, from which they soon sold out to advantage’. 29 They found splendid gold before his father sold his interest and they returned to Thames in September 1868. 30 Quinn, who owned one-fifth of the interests when the claim was registered in June, sold three-quarters of his interest at the end of October 1869 for an unknown price. 31 His father, who owned a three-quarter share, sold a half share for £150. 32 With others, Thomas then re-applied for the ground, but abandoned it in May 1870. 33

Back in Thames, in October 1868 Quinn became one of the four owners of the Countess of Collingwood; each owner had one share. 34 In June 1869, he purchased one share in the Star of Fortune, at Waiotahi Creek, for 2s 6d. 35 With a partner he acquired the Sprig of Shillelagh at Karaka later that year, abandoning it the following year and then applying for a new lease. 36 With another partner, he applied for a claim in the Karaka Block in 1870. 37 The following year, he held 500 shares in the Oriental Company. 38 In September 1872 his 50 shares in the Mary Ann Company were liable for forfeiture if a call was not paid. 39 He did pay, to be warned, nine months later, that he would lose them if the fifth call remained unpaid. 40

Quinn worked in the Golden Crown ‘prior to the striking of the historic run of gold which came down into it from the Manukau ground, and afterwards ran into the Caledonian’. At the time this run was discovered, Richard Harris 41 was the manager of the latter. 42

“Dick,” says Mr Quinn, “came into our level and, continuing our face, took out a crushing from the reef. From my experience in the Crown, I knew that the stone was at the time becoming poorer, and I told him so, but he thought otherwise. At any rate he crushed a parcel from the drive, and the result was poor, in comparison with what the Crown had been getting. The shares, which had just before been sold as high as £20, fell to £10. On my advice, Mr Harris then came back to the boundary, and started to sink a winze on the reef. After he had his windlass rigged, and everything was ready for the sinking, a change of management was made, Mr Harris being superseded by Mr William Rowe. Had Dick been allowed to continue sinking he, and not Mr Rowe, would have had the first really rich gold in the Caledonian, for, as you know, within five feet from the floor of the level the gold set in richer than ever.”

By at least February 1872, when he and his partners were sued, by a miner dismissed for incompetence, for failing to fulfil a contract in the Caledonian, Quinn had left the Golden Crown to work in it. He ‘saw some of the richest part of the patch taken out’ of a reef varying from three to 25 feet in width, and recalled that ‘where it was biggest it was richest. I have seen bands of gold running through it as wide as my hand – and not merely one band, but several – yellow masses that could be clearly seen from a distance of 20 feet’. He was given a contract to stope out ‘a large block of the reef’ at £8 per cubic fathom, ‘and at this work he continued for about two years, after which he was given the position of underground boss’. In late 1872, when working in the Cure, he helped recover the body of a miner killed by an explosion in the Manukau. The following March, with two others he won damages of £30 (they had sought £100) from a director of the Evening Star Company who had claimed to be entitled to lease a portion on tribute. They had engaged men and purchased tools, but as the company

Quinn was described in 1902 as having been ‘one of the most popular mine-managers’ at Thames. According to an obituary, ‘at the age of 18 he was placed in charge of a mine’, suggesting a date of around 1869. In 1923 he recalled becoming manager of the ‘original Queen of Beauty proprietary, before the flotation of the limited liability company’, dating this to some time between 1872 and 1874 but also to 1877, the latter clearly being incorrect.

It was at that time a very productive property, though it had been bought by the shareholders only a short time [before] for something like £8 or £10 apiece. Two large reefs being worked.... A large staff of miners was employed, and for a long period gold stampers in different batteries on the field were kept fed by the mine’s output. For years the fortunate proprietors received dividends at the rate of £100 each per week.

Next he became manager of the Bird in Hand, an appointment that can be dated to October 1874, he was nominated by Denis Murphy, later an associate at Te Aroha. ‘In working a small reef, he obtained for a time returns running as high as 500oz per month’, but did not mention that the mine ceased operations in early 1875.

In October 1868, his father was a member of a committee that asked the Maori landowners to open Ohinemuri for mining.\textsuperscript{56} Six years later, Quinn was one of those calling a meeting about taking action to open this district, and was present at the opening of this new goldfield three months later.\textsuperscript{57} In March 1875, he was one of the owners of the Rising Sun, at Karangahake,\textsuperscript{58} but soon became interested in Waitakauri, in May being registered as an owner of the Homeward Bound there.\textsuperscript{59} In October, he was an owner of the Beehive, and in November of the New-found-out.\textsuperscript{60} In 1877, mine manager Charles Henry Wilson, later of Waiorongomai,\textsuperscript{61} thanked those who had assisted him to develop the main Waitakauri mine, including, in its ‘early days’, Quinn.\textsuperscript{62} The following year, he joined the new Ohinemuri Mining Association,\textsuperscript{63} which prospected several areas in that district.

Late in December 1875, he acquired his first interests in Owharoa mines, becoming a part owner of both the Alert and Mount Pleasant; the latter was forfeited for non-working two months later.\textsuperscript{64}

To Warden Straafod Esq

Sir I the undersigned do hereby lodge an objection the granting of protection of the keep it dark champion lode No 4 Mark Moon and surprise on the ground that the have not been worked according to the mining regulations

Singed Edward Quinn.

Under questioning from the warden, Henry Aldborough Stratford, Quinn stated that ‘his reason for objecting was because the ground had not been worked according to the regulations’, by which he meant ‘re working ground’. Stratford handed him a copy of the regulations ‘requesting him to find and point out the regulations he specially referred to in making this objection, but this he failed to do, and handed back the regulations saying he objected on the general grounds of non working’. He stated that the Mark Moon ‘had only been worked 17 days since it was taken up about a year and nine months ago’. When Cornes wanted Stratford to ask Quinn if he possessed a miner’s right, the newspaper used italics in reporting the subsequent exchange:

Mr Quinn said he was, but on being produced it proved to have been only taken out the previous day, being dated July 18th. Mr Quinn went on to state that the Surprise had been worked about three months, the No 4 Champion Lode about three months, and the Keep it Dark about six weeks, all four claims having been taken up about a year a nine months or two years ago. In reply to the Warden, Mr Quinn admitted he had held interest in one of the claims mentioned, namely, in the Keep it Dark, in which he held shares for over a year, and transferred his interest about nine months ago.

The Warden: How long was the Keep it Dark worked whilst you were a shareholder in it? Mr Quinn: About six weeks.

The Warden: And when work was stopped what did you do then, I suppose you applied to the late Warden Kenrick for protection?

Mr Quinn: No protection your Worship, the ground was left idle.

The Warden: Why left idle?

Mr Quinn: Because there were no funds wherewith to work it.

The Warden having put some further questions, asked Mr Quinn if he wished to make any further statement to support his objection; whereupon Mr Quinn commenced to spin a yarn respecting the manner in which the whole district was locked up, etc, etc; in the delivery of which the Warden cut him short by remarking he did not want a speech from him, but would listen to anything he had got to say with reference to his objection. He was quite aware of the circumstances of the districts, and with respect to what was being done as regards the claims under consideration, before he granted them protection on the last occasion. No further evidence being forthcoming, the Warden addressing Mr Quinn said, I consider this objection comes with very bad grace from you, who, on your own admission, held an interest in the Keep it Dark for a year, during which time you say only six weeks’ work was done on the ground, and during the balance of the time you were a shareholder the ground was left idle, without even protection being asked for; and now, because you no longer hold an interest in it, you try to turn others out of it. Nobody knows better than you do, as you stand there, that I heard all about the state of affairs as regards these claims, when protection was previously applied for. The least you could have done was to show me you were one of the “unemployed,” and desiring to go and work on the ground you object to being further protected. An objection would have come better from any outsider than from you, one of the original shareholders.

After this tongue-lashing, Stratford granted all the claims three months’ protection. The Te Aroha News was informed that Quinn’s statement that the Mark Moon had been worked for only 14 days was ‘utterly false and calculated to mislead. The end aimed at was evidently the forfeiture of the ground’. ‘Old Resident’, who had attended the hearing, applauded Stratford’s ‘severe, but richly deserved rebuke’. His ‘outspoken and just remarks’ had given very general satisfaction, and been commented on in the highest terms on every hand. But it is a matter of regret that the Warden did not call for any witnesses to be examined, as had he done so evidence of a very important nature would have been given. I have heard it stated on good authority by several persons, that Mr Quinn intimated very plainly that he would be willing to withdraw the objection lodged by him, for an inducement such as an interest in the ground. Let him deny it if he can. I have further heard it publicly stated that during the whole time Mr Quinn was a shareholder in the Keep it Dark ... although two calls were made to meet working expenses, he did not pay his share of the calls, and has not done so to this day. If these statements are correct, I ask, what could be more mean and contemptible than, for a person, having left his fellow shareholders in a mine to meet the working expenses, and still owing his calls, to turn round on his former mates, and endeavour to get their ground forfeited, on the plea that the mining regulations had not been complied with? Had Mr Quinn succeeded in his little game, would he have gone to work himself on the ground, or is he in a better position to influence capital than those who hold the ground? Was his objective the welfare of the district, or the chance of making a “rise” out of the ground, if forfeited? What has Mr Quinn ever done to advance the interests of Te Aroha, mining, or otherwise? Has he any stake at all in the district? I am not aware of any, in fact, I believe he is not even a ratepayer.92

Quinn chose not to respond, and later that year left the district to spend several months prospecting in Ohinemuri.93

Quinn’s biography in the Cyclopedia of New Zealand described him as being a ‘practical mine manager’.94 In 1887, when he successfully applied for a certificate of competence, Dennis Gilmore MacDonnell, a prominent legal manager and investor,95 certified that he had managed mines for ‘many years’ at Thames and Te Aroha and bore ‘a high character for competency, skill and trustworthiness’.96 In 1892, he received a mine manager’s service certificate.97 Later that year, he was elected to the committee of the Mine Managers’ Association, and two months later was elected one of its two vice-presidents.98 His first class certificate was issued later without his having to sit any examinations.99

After Kenrick’s death, Quinn was one of the Te Aroha representatives on a committee formed to choose a suitable memorial.100

OHINEMURI IN THE 1880s

In December 1881, when Quinn bought a Paeroa hotel ‘for a large price’, the Thames Star predicted that his ‘connection with mining matters, and his well known and amicable qualities will shortly make him a favorite landlord’.101 Perhaps he was, but his Imperial Hotel struggled financially, prompting several threats of legal action to obtain payment of the rent.102 As part of the service, he was the Paeroa agent for Cobb and Co’s coaches.103 There was never any criticism of his conduct of the hotel, which he sold in mid-1883.104 He was aware of the perils of being a publican through having been a witness in an 1873 case against a Thames one who permitted gambling on his premises.105 The following year, he and a friend had got a barmaid out of bed at 7.00 in the morning to serve them beer after falsely claiming to be travellers; after he left the premises, his friend raped the barmaid.106

At Waitekauri, in 1881 Quinn became one of the six owners of the Shannon, with one of the 15 shares.107 During that year he invested in two companies, Waitekauri Success and the City of Dublin.108 In mid-year, with a partner he took ‘the upper portion of the Waitekauri Company’s ground, known as the Leahy claim,\textsuperscript{109} on tribute'. A local correspondent considered them to be the right men to find gold.\textsuperscript{110}

In 1882, when four miners sued him for forfeiture of the Ohinemuri, at Karangahake, Kenrick's suspicions were raised by the plaint being laid 'within a few hours after protection expired'. One plaintiff 'said he knew when laying the plaint that Quinn did not intend to work the ground. In reply to the Court he said he was under the impression that Quinn intended to abandon it, but had not promised him any interest if the case succeeded, and he believed none of his mates had done so'. Another plaintiff stated Quinn had said he 'could lay a plaint to obtain possession if he chose. He also remarked that he would like to have an interest if they succeeded', and accordingly was promised a share.

His Worship said there could be no doubt this was a collusive action. Defendant had incurred liability to forfeiture by his own neglect to work the ground, and wishing to retain some title to it, had obtained the assistance of the present complainants. This was a clear case of collusion, and he would, therefore, refuse the order prayed for. If they wished to obtain the ground defendant could abandon it in the ordinary manner and they could re-peg it, taking the risk of other parties stepping in before them.\textsuperscript{111}

With others, he owned the Paeroa, Diana, and Home Rule.\textsuperscript{112} In September, he forfeited Luck's All.\textsuperscript{113} Late in the year, he invested in two Karangahake companies, the Noble and the Diana.\textsuperscript{114} In November, he applied for the Perseverance and the Favorite, having different partners in each claim.\textsuperscript{115} Their pegging out of the latter had incorporated land already pegged out by Hone Werahiko, who sued for the forfeiture of their Wheel of Fortune for non-working, 'so that it is certain to be awarded to Hone'.\textsuperscript{116} The following year, Quinn acquired 500 shares of the 20,000 in the Crown Company.\textsuperscript{117}

In October 1887, Quinn visited a new find near Whangamata, immediately starting prospecting amongst ‘some of the best prospectors on the peninsula’.\textsuperscript{118} He did not make any valuable discoveries. Late that year, he was prospecting at Maratoto, and by January his eight-man party had found good ore in the Arizona; a small parcel was sent to Auckland.\textsuperscript{119} In mid-March, in the Arizona ‘at Peel’s Creek, the southward of Maratoto proper, Quinn and party are getting good dirt’.\textsuperscript{120} Three months later, they sold this claim to a foreign syndicate for a ‘highly satisfactory’ price, £1,750 in cash.\textsuperscript{121}

In August, when he was appointed to manage the Silver Queen, the \textit{Thames Advertiser} congratulated ‘the shareholders of having secured the services of such an experienced and energetic manager’.\textsuperscript{122}

\textbf{WAIHI IN THE 1880s AND 1890s}

Quinn followed the first prospectors to Waihi once Billy Nicholl’s discovery had been confirmed.\textsuperscript{123} In June 1881, with nine others he owned the Comstock, which they forfeited in August the following year.\textsuperscript{124} In February 1882, he became one of 15 owners of Specimen hill, forfeited seven months later.\textsuperscript{125} In November 1888, he was appointed manager of the Silverton.\textsuperscript{126} The following September, it was reported that he and ‘a small staff’ had ‘a fair show’ from their prospecting it, but later that year, or early the next one, work was suspended.\textsuperscript{127} Also in 1889, he became one of the eight owners of the Eclipse, with one of the ten shares; it was sold five months later.\textsuperscript{128}

The only Waihi company he invested in during the 1890s was La Mascotte, with 2,000 of the 75,000 shares.\textsuperscript{129} The following month, July 1896, he resigned as manager of the Waihi Extended to move to Opitonui.\textsuperscript{130} During 1895 and 1896, he served on the committee that formed the Waihi School of Mines.\textsuperscript{131}

\textbf{THE THAMES DISTRICT IN THE 1880s AND 1890s}

Despite leaving the district, Quinn had retained an interest in Thames mining, in February 1888 being granted protection for the Prospectors’ Claim at Karaka Creek.\textsuperscript{132} At Tararu, in May 1890 he was appointed to manage the Norfolk, and until the following May did a lot of prospecting for this company before being appointed the Sylvia Company’s manager.\textsuperscript{133} When work was suspended in February 1893, Quinn was to stay on because the stoppage was meant to be temporary whilst finances were sorted out and calls collected.\textsuperscript{134} Two months later, as the company had sold its property, he explored the King Country for two months.\textsuperscript{135} In early 1893, he was on a committee drawing up a scheme to test the Thames low levels.\textsuperscript{136} In April 1895, he was appointed manager of the Royal Company’s Tapu mine.\textsuperscript{137}

That Quinn was a judge for athletic sports organized by the Thames Miners’ Union in 1893 implied that he supported this organization.

By July 1893 he had ‘returned from the King Country’, where he ‘had very successful trials with Racka Rock’, an explosive presumably used in prospecting. In August 1895, he tested ore in the Lydia, in an unspecified district. The following month, he was reported to have discovered a new reef containing ‘excellent ore’ on the main range between Tairua and Matatoki, in a previously unexplored belt of country in the Wires area. No more was heard of this find. In July 1896 it was reported that Quinn and Thomas Corbett, briefly a Waiorongomai miner, had found gold near Paeroa; once again, nothing further was heard of this discovery.

In January 1894, he purchased a one-fifteenth interest in the Welcome, at Waitekauri, selling it 15 days later. In June 1895, he was chosen from 15 applicants to manage the Waitekauri No. 4, holding this post at least into the following year. The following year, he held 8,000 shares, in trust, out of the 120,000 shares in the Belmont Company. Although this appointment has not been traced, one version of the song ‘Waitekauri Every Time’ lists him as a manager of the Grace Darling.

In 1896, he held 1,000 of the 150,000 in Kinsella’s Owharoa Freehold Company, the same number of the 60,000 issued by the Owharoa United

REEFTON, 1894-1896

At the start of 1894, Quinn was appointed to manage the Big River Company’s mine at Reefton, for £300 per year.\textsuperscript{150} He managed it ‘for about two years’.\textsuperscript{151}

OPITONUI MINING, 1896-c. 1908

After returning from Reefton, Quinn ‘was placed in charge of the mining on the Kauri Freehold Gold Estates syndicate’s property of 37,000 acres, between Mercury Bay and Whangapoua. This enterprise, which resulted in no developments of permanent importance, was his last effort in connection with the goldfields’.\textsuperscript{152} This London company appointed him as its manager in July 1896, enticing him away from managing a Waihi mine.\textsuperscript{153} In 1897, Quinn had to supervise the Maiden, Hilda, Lanigan’s, Owera, and Murphy's Hill mines, all at Opitonui, near Whangapoua, and three or four miles apart; he visited them when doing ‘his rounds each day on horse-back’.\textsuperscript{154}

\textbf{THE TWENTIETH CENTURY}

Quinn continued to invest in a few companies in the early years of the century. He acquired 250 of the 75,000 shares in the New Sylvia, reworking the Tararu mine of that name, in 1905.\textsuperscript{161} The following year, he was allotted 800 shares in the Halcyon, at Thames.\textsuperscript{162} In 1908, when he described his occupation as ‘gentleman’, he was a vendor in the Silver Hill, at Karangahake, receiving 4,000 of its 160,000 shares, value 2s, paid up to 6d.\textsuperscript{163} In August 1909, he had 500 2s shares, paid up to 6d, in the Point Russell Company, at Thames; by September 1910 he had sold them all.\textsuperscript{164}

The defendant’s solicitor ‘suggested that the whole case was a trumped up case’, Quinn being used ‘as a tool’ by a speculator who hoped the ‘defendant would pay instead of fighting the case’. His solicitor successfully asked for a non-suit, ‘as he could see that after Quinn’s statement, it was useless going on’; Quinn was required to pay £12 in costs.\textsuperscript{170}

One of Quinn’s political opponents, the editor of the Te Aroha News, John Illott,\(^\text{173}\) described him as ‘a miner and road contractor working wherever he can find work suitable’.\(^\text{174}\) The first contract sought was in 1877, to clear the road between Mackaytown and Owharoa.\(^\text{175}\) One and a half years later, he won one to form part of the road between Paeroa and Katikati, at £2 a chain; he had to cut off most of the small hills between Mackaytown and the first bridge near Karangahake.\(^\text{176}\) In 1882, with his former partner, Clem Cornes, he petitioned parliament over their 1879 contract to make a road between Paeroa and Te Aroha. ‘On account of a survey party having been fired on by the Natives the Native Minister directed them to desist from further work; that the work was stopped for nearly four months at a great loss to themselves’. Despite the then minister, John Sheehan, testifying that he had stopped them working because they were working in the block where Daldy McWilliams had been shot,\(^\text{177}\) and might have been shot also, their request for compensation was declined.\(^\text{178}\)

In June 1880, a reporter described his visit to Te Aroha:

A vast area of marshy land both above and below the landing is being drained by parties of men employed by Mr Edward Quinn, who was successful in obtaining the contract some weeks ago. Several miles of excellent drains have been cut already, and the work is making good progress. I believe the best part of the next half-year will be occupied in completing the contract.\(^\text{179}\)

He obtained additional labour to speed up this work, which in November was described as successful.\(^\text{180}\) He sought more contracts for county works in 1881.\textsuperscript{181} In August that year, when unsuccessfully tendering for two drainage contracts in the Aroha Block, he described himself as a contractor.\textsuperscript{182}

In 1886 he tendered, unsuccessfully, to make a sledge track at Stoney Creek.\textsuperscript{183} The following year, his tender to form roads for the Piako County Council, for £95, was accepted.\textsuperscript{184} During that year, he sought more contracts in the outlying areas of the county, sometimes successfully.\textsuperscript{185} In December, after failing to win any of the three contracts to make sections of a track from Waiorongomai to Tui, Denis Murphy, whom he had known in Thames, told his fellow councillors that he should have received one because the successful tenderer had won another one, and he believed if Quinn’s ‘contract were accepted, his work would be a pattern for the Engineer to go by’.\textsuperscript{186} His tenders to form part of the road between Waiorongomai and Shaftesbury and from the Waiorongomai Landing to Kilgour Street at Waiorongomai were accepted in February.\textsuperscript{187} Five months later, Shaftesbury ratepayers complained that his contract, like others contractors’, had ‘not been properly carried out’, blaming the county engineer for not supervising adequately to ensure they were ‘fully carried out in accordance with the provisions’.\textsuperscript{188} In the following month, all his household furniture was sold, as he was leaving the district; the sale was ‘very successful’, with ‘good prices being realized’.\textsuperscript{189} He never sought another contract.

was transferred to his father in December 1884. His level of skill as a farmer is unknown, but when a Te Aroha resident’s cow was poisoned by tutu in 1883 he saved its life by bleeding it. Two years later, he bought eight acres, the unreserved portion of the Ohinemuri cemetery, for £4 per acre. After leaving Te Aroha in 1887, he erected ‘a villa residence’ on this land, part of ‘the Pukerimu block, near the Tarariki creek’, and also near his father’s farm. No record has survived of his farming this land.

SPORT AND HORSE RACING

Occasionally Quinn was involved in sports, as an organizer rather than a participant. In October 1886, he was the starter for a Te Aroha regatta to celebrate the Prince of Wales’ birthday. In 1893, he judged the wrestling at the Thames Miners’ Union Athletic Sports, and five years later was elected a vice-president of the Opitonui Football Club.

At the Thames Jockey Club Races held during the Christmas holidays of 1881, his Snowstorm came second in both the Novel Race and the Consolation Handicap. Three years later, his Navigator won the Miners’ Purse at the Te Aroha race meeting. In 1886, he was a member of the committee to organize race meetings for the Te Aroha Jockey Club, and was both a steward and a handicapper. One and a half years later, his handicapping for a Paeroa race meeting produced ‘very great satisfaction’. He fulfilled this role again for the Ohinemuri Jockey Club the following year. In 1892, he was on the committee of the Thames Jockey Club.

INVolvEMENT IN LOCAL GOVERNMENT AT Te AROHA

In 1886, Quinn was elected unopposed to the Te Aroha licensing committee. He was stated to hold ‘moderate views’. His attitude to the use and misuse of alcohol may have been influenced by his father’s conviction for drunkenness in 1870. When a woman applied for a license to run the Club Hotel, after saying that ‘personally he objected to a single woman holding a license’, he moved to accept her application because it was supported by the police and the hotel’s owner. The following year he was re-elected with 33 votes, the top scoring candidate receiving two more.

In January 1886, he filled a vacancy on the Hot Springs Domain Board. He soon clashed with other members over using the walls of the bathhouses for advertising, which he favoured. In late 1887, when he left the district to live near Paeroa, he offered his resignation; although the board declined to accept it, the government, replaced him with John Ilott, editor of the Te Aroha News. On learning of this decision, the chairman, Thomas Gavin, commented that the members regretted ‘exceedingly’ that his ‘valuable services’ had ‘been dispensed with’, and asked to know the reason. When Gavin was told he was removed because of leaving the district, he explained that Quinn was away prospecting and had left only temporarily, and asked who had complained about him, and about what.

No reply was received, but, as Quinn had left permanently, the protests ended.

Quinn was always involved in local issues, for example chairing Denis Murphy’s 1884 Quartzville meeting during the county council election.
Although he would have preferred Te Aroha to have become a borough, in 1887, in the first election for the town board, he was nominated as a ‘working man’s candidate’. Although unable to address an election meeting because of attending a domain board meeting, he received the second highest vote, 138; the highest scoring candidate received 151.

At the board’s first meeting he was elected chairman. When he and another member, a carpenter, warned that ‘their work often took them away from the township during the week, but that they generally returned on Saturday evenings’, it was agreed to hold meetings then. Eight months later, the other members complained that neither had attended board meetings since July. ‘Some discussion took place relative to the action of those members who had thus thrown the whole work and responsibility of the board upon three members; which was most unfair’. As Quinn had left the district without requesting leave of absence, they resolved that he be asked ‘if he is prepared to resume his duties’. He responded by resigning because of working elsewhere. The Te Aroha News was critical of his performance, claiming that ‘by a bit of smartness he got himself appointed chairman pro tem at the first meeting’, and then ‘attended the meetings so long as the board had a considerable sum of money to expend, and contracts were to be let’. He then went to another district, missing three meetings,

IN INVOLVEMENT IN LOCAL GOVERNMENT IN OHINEMURI

From an early age, Quinn had taken an interest in local government issues in Ohinemuri. In 1876, he attended a Mackaytown meeting protesting at being included in the Thames County Council. 220 In 1881 he seconded the nomination of a mine manager seeking election to it. 221 In November 1887, he topped the poll for the Karangahake Riding of the new Ohinemuri County Council, receiving 34 votes. 222 The Te Aroha News, when criticizing his performance on the town board, claimed that he was boasting that he would become chairman of the council, and predicted that choosing him would be an ‘unfortunate start’ for it and members would regret choosing him. 223 In response, an Ohinemuri correspondent described him as ‘a highly respected resident of both Ohinemuri and Te Aroha’ who ‘was actually requested to become a candidate for the chair in the interests of the goldfields riding which he represents, but he flatly declined saying that he had neither the time nor the inclination for the position. The action of the News has been rather adversely criticized’. 224 In Te Aroha, a ‘well-attended public meeting’ was convened because of this ‘unjustifiable attack’, chaired by James Mills, 225 who had clashed with Ilott. Alfred Henry Whitehouse, 226 who had also been in dispute with Ilott, stated that at the request of a very large number of residents, who had felt deeply indignant at the malicious statements with reference to Mr Quinn that had occasionally appeared in the News, more especially in last Saturday’s issue, he had called the meeting, and at the same time had notified the person responsible for the articles complained of, of the object of the meeting and requested his attendance, but he felt deep regret that Mr Ilott had thought fit to remain away.

His resolution, passed unanimously, regretted ‘the unjust and uncalled attack’, and thanked Quinn for his efforts to help Te Aroha and regretted ‘that circumstances over which he had no control should have called him from our district’. Ilott did not report this meeting.

Quinn served three years on the Ohinemuri council. His involvement has not been traced in detail, but some of his more belligerent comments have been noted. At its first meeting, in the light of its finances the finance committee recommended reducing travelling expenses for those coming from more than three miles away. Quinn ‘said he had no intention when he came out as a candidate for election of working for nothing; other Crs might do as they would, but he intended if he lost time to get paid for it’. The Te Aroha News highlighted his attempt to prevent the council placing any advertisements in it; as the contract to do so had been accepted, Quinn stated he ‘had purposed moving that the resolution accepting the offer of publishing advertisements ‘to be rescinded, but saw he could not so’. He ‘then made a general attack on council for letting the said contract, and in fact got quite excited over the matter, making use of very strong expressions emphasizing his remarks with violent gestures, etc, and generally acted in a most uncalled for manner’. The other councillors, pleased at having a much cheaper rate for their advertising, variously considered his remarks ‘quite out of order’, ‘altogether out of order’, and ‘most uncalled for and offensive’, as the arrangement was ‘fair and above board’. Quinn had ‘made remarks such as should not be uttered’, apparently ‘animated by private animosity to’ Ilott, who concluded his report by stating that councillors ‘generally showed their disapproval of Mr Quinn’s very uncalled for remarks and the dictatorial manner he sought to assume’. The Hauraki Tribune, which, although declining to publish the advertisements on the same terms but not admitting to this, stated that Quinn ‘was quite right in calling the whole transaction a piece of jobbery’.

At the subsequent meeting, Quinn’s amendment to appoint a foreman of works rather than an engineer and suggestion about how to pay the latter was not seconded. When discussing the need to sue those who had not paid their rates, a fellow councillor, John Hoey Moore, who had opposed his behaviour over the Te Aroha News, interjected:

Cr Moore: There is one person’s name on the list, who would not like to be summoned.
Cr Quinn: Who is that?
Cr Moore: Cr Edward Quinn, for 6s 3d.
Cr Quinn said he never received a notice. The clerk said it had been duly sent to Cr Quinn.

Three months later, for an unknown reason Quinn resigned his appointment as chairman and returning officer for a Karangahake meeting held to discuss a county loan.

In November 1888, ‘A Sufferer’ claimed Quinn was quite wrong in his statements about a road planned for Waitoa, which he opposed making; he ‘must be either greatly mistaken with regard to the locality of the road, or intentionally stated that which is not true’. At a council meeting two months later, Quinn again opposed accepting a tender for it. When he claimed another councillor’s views were inconsistent, the latter responded that Quinn ‘had misrepresented him in the same way several times before’ about a Karangahake contract, and in explained his position yet again complained that it was ‘very unfair’ of Quinn to keep misrepresenting him. ‘He hoped Cr Quinn would not repeat his misstatements on this question any more’; two fellow councillors agreed. As another example of his bluntness, at the last meeting for 1889 he described the track between Maratoto and Waitekauri as a ‘put up job’, badly made.

In addition to being a councillor, in February 1888 he topped the poll for the Ohinemuri Licensing Committee, with 70 votes. Two months later, when the chairman resigned, he was elected to replace him.

NATIONAL POLITICS

In 1879, Quinn was elected to the committee of the Paeroa Liberal Association, and remained a supporter of this party for all his life. In 1886 he signed an address presented to Sir George Grey to mark his seventy-fourth birthday. At an election meeting four years later he moved a vote of support for the Liberal candidate.

PRIVATE LIFE

In 1884, when aged 32, Quinn married Marion Casserley Martin, aged 24, in Auckland’s Catholic cathedral. A farmer’s daughter, she had been born in County Roscommon, Ireland. They were to have four sons and three daughters; one of the latter died before Quinn. Their first two daughters, Mary Gertrude and Kathleen Agnes, were born in Te Aroha, in October 1885 and January 1887. Edmund John was born almost exactly two years later, at Paeroa, also the birthplace of Annie Martina, born in April 1890. Henry Edward Patrick was born in 1892 at Thames.

their last children, born there when Quinn was 44, were twins Thomas Richard and Sylvester James.248

When Quinn’s father died in 1902, he left three sons and five daughters.249 In that year, his second son, another Thomas, born in 1870, was underground manager of a Western Australian mine.250 He had earlier won fame for his athletic ability, but also for larrakinism and vandalism.251 Possibly he was the Thomas Quinn, a Karangahake miner, who was admitted to Thames hospital in 1900 suffering from influenza and alcoholism, or the Thomas Quinn, a Waihi miner, who attempted suicide in 1903.252 John Richard, born in 1872, was a publican at Gisborne in 1902.253 Also living in Gisborne in the twentieth century were Marion’s brothers, one a cordial manufacturer and the other a hotelkeeper.254 Two of Quinn’s five sisters married miners and the others a sawyer, a hotelkeeper, and a carpenter.255

DEATHS

Quinn was in good health until late in his life, the only accident recorded being two broken ribs in a coach crash near Owharoa in 1889.256 ‘Owing to ill-health’, he ‘spent the last 15 years in retirement’; he was granted a pension because of having miners’ complaint.257 During his years of retirement ‘he never wearied of relating reminiscences of his most eventful life’.258 When he died at his Auckland home, of a heart attack rather than miners’ complaint, on Christmas Day 1924, aged 75, he was noted as being ‘the oldest Auckland mine manager’.259

His widow died less than five years later, in July 1929, also of heart failure, aged 74 according to her death certificate, thereby shaving five years off her age.260 Unlike her husband, she left a will, leaving £1,059 1s 5d to her daughters.261

CONCLUSION

Quinn’s life was another example of how miners took whatever job was available, meaning he worked on almost every goldfield in Hauraki, sometimes only briefly. He also prospected in the King Country and for a time was a mine manager at Reefton. Like so many others, occasionally he combined mining with other occupations, in his case being a publican and a contractor. And like many others, he was exposed as pushing the boundaries of legality in his efforts to acquire or to retain mining ground. He played a particularly active role in local government, often making enemies because of his determined, sometimes aggressive, defence of his views. His long years of mining meant he suffered from miners’ complaint in his old age, which may have adversely affected his temperament.
