WILLIAM NICHOLLS, HERA TE WHAKAAWA, AND THEIR CHILDREN

Abstract: Two years after arriving in New Zealand in 1840, William Nicholls married Hera Te Whakaawa, who had an illustrious whakapapa. For the rest of his life he lived as a Pakeha Maori, trading and farming on land owned by his wife. Like other Pakeha, he was excited by the discoveries of gold, and was involved in a minor way with the Coromandel and Thames goldfields and at Te Aroha, near where he was living, where he and one of his sons did some prospecting. The penultimate Pakeha Maori to die in the Te Aroha district, he was a well-respected member of the community.

Nicholls ensured that his children were well educated, and in most cases they did well in Pakeha society and made ‘good’ marriages: the daughters to Pakeha and the sons to Maori. The lives of three of his children are summarized; the others are dealt with in other papers.

ARRIVAL IN NEW ZEALAND

William Nicholls was born in Falmouth, Cornwall, in 1818 to Obadiah, a master mariner, and Alice, née Grey.<sup>1</sup> He was the third son, James being born in 1815 and John the following year; his two sisters, Charlotte and Alice Ann Grey, both died shortly after birth, and his brothers had died by 1865.<sup>2</sup> A wheelwright by trade,<sup>3</sup> ‘after making several trips to South America in the clipper “Mail Brigs” that regularly ran between Falmouth and South, America, he came to New Zealand’, where he remained, apart from ‘a short trip’ to visit relatives in Melbourne.<sup>4</sup> (Two years after her husband’s death in 1822, his widow had married Samuel Box and had had another six children; the family moved to Victoria in 1854, and, after about 50 years of separation, in 1886 his half-brother Edward invited him to visit.)<sup>5</sup>

In January 1840, aged 21, and giving his occupation as a cooper, Nicholls arrived in Wellington on the 'Aurora', the first emigrant ship sent by the New Zealand Company.<sup>6</sup> 'Not finding Wellington to his taste', he moved to Auckland 'shortly afterwards', where he helped to erect the first government buildings.<sup>7</sup> He farmed at Tauranga for 'a few years' either before or after moving to Auckland.<sup>8</sup>

HIS FAMILY

In 1842, when in Tauranga, at the age of 24 he married, under Maori custom, Hera, otherwise Sarah, Te Whakaawa.<sup>9</sup> She was the eldest sister of Te Moananui Manao, the leading Ngai Te Rangi rangatira, who lived in that district.<sup>10</sup> An obituary described her as 'a chieftainess' of Ngai Te Rangi and Ngati Haua.<sup>11</sup> One of her sons gave her genealogy:

Poutu
 Te Awe
 Rangipumamao
 Rapoi
 Koroki
 Hape
 Mihikiterangi
 Te Kura
 Te Uruwhakamaro, who married Nohowaina
 Penga, who married Nohaoao
 Haru, who married Pirihira,
 Hera Te Whakaawa.<sup>12</sup>

As Hera's death was not registered, her age is unknown. She had died before her eldest daughter successfully applied in February 1869 to be registered as the owner of the Ruakaka block at Te Aroha: 'My mother's name was Hera Whakaawa – She was a sister of Te Wharenuī',<sup>13</sup> a Ngati Haua rangatira.<sup>14</sup>

At Nicholls' death in 1900 one son and three daughters were living at Mangaiti, where he resided;<sup>15</sup> in his last years he was mainly living with his other son, William Grey Nicholls, in Paeroa.<sup>16</sup> The family was sometimes known as Nikora, a transliteration of Nicholls. None of their births were registered:

Harete/Harriet, otherwise Charlotte, was born in 1844;<sup>17</sup> she married John William Richard Guilding before leaving him for Joseph Harris Smallman;<sup>18</sup>

Susan, otherwise Huhana, was born in Coromandel, probably in the late 1840s or early 1850s;<sup>19</sup> she married Richard Hartley Cartman;<sup>20</sup>

William Grey, otherwise Wiremu Kerei, was born on 26 December 1853; he married Rihitoto Mataia, and was a future chairman of the Ohinemuri County Council and a Legislative Councillor;<sup>21</sup>

Alice Grey, otherwise Hera or Arihi Kerei Tiara, was born at Okauia, near Matamata, in 1855;<sup>22</sup> she married Charles John Dearle;<sup>23</sup>

James, or Hemi, Ponui, was born at Coromandel on 9 October 1856;<sup>24</sup> he married Hera, otherwise Merea, Kiriwaitai;<sup>25</sup>

Another daughter, name and date of birth unknown, died at Mrs Kissling's school in Auckland at an unknown date.<sup>26</sup>

An obituary stated that he had ensured all his children were 'carefully brought up and educated'.<sup>27</sup> According to a tradition handed down in Alice Grey Dearle's family, which muddled him with his son William Grey Nicholls, it was the parents' 'decision, as their "half-caste" children grew up in the harsh world of the rural pioneer, that their daughters would all marry pakeha and thus elevate themselves into "society" – and their sons would marry Maori and the Nikora family would continue its tribal bloodlines'.<sup>28</sup> Certainly the marriages entered into by all his children could confirm this extremely pragmatic policy, though it may have been equally or more likely that love between the couples was more relevant.

LIFE BEFORE THE WAIKATO WAR

In 1844, according to Nicholls' 1871 account, he went to Purupuru,<sup>29</sup> described in 1900 as being 'near where the present bridge' crossed the Waihou River on the road 'from Matamata to Tauranga'.<sup>30</sup> He remained there 'not quite 12 months'. In 1845, with a Maori companion, he visited Te Aroha when 'coming down on a trip to Hauraki from Matamata', and also visited Waiharakeke and 'Te Moki near Te Kotuku, a little above Manawaru', seeing neither Ngati Maru nor Ngati Haua living there.<sup>31</sup> At an unknown date he erected a flax mill in the 'Upper Thames'.<sup>32</sup>

In November 1880, a Thames Advertiser correspondent met 'an old resident' of Te Aroha, almost certainly Nicholls.

He stated that he was a member of the Government survey party under Colonel Chesney, which visited the Aroha district in 1852 ... for the purpose of erecting a trig station on the top of the mountain. One day whilst his men were busy doing their work,

Chesney, who was fossicking about, picked up something, and immediately became quite excited, and continued so for several hours. He did not inform the party what he discovered, although several of them had seen him stoop and pick up the substance, but on arriving in Auckland some time after he disclosed the nature of his discovery to the Surveyor-General, and showed that official a piece of quartz showing a little gold. Nothing was, however, done in the matter ... the reason being, no doubt, that as the land in question was in the hands of the natives, it would not be advisable to prospect and discover a payable goldfield for the benefit of Maoris. Our informant noticed when with the surveyors that plenty of loose quartz was lying about on the surface, and thought gold must be in some of them; but the hurried way in which the survey was made prevented him from testing the stone.<sup>33</sup>

In 1854, he went by canoe up the Waihou River to Omahu, the pa at Te Aroha, and then further upriver to Waiharakeke; he 'used to travel about a good deal there at that time'. The following year he settled at Purupuru, 'grazing and trading with the Natives'.<sup>34</sup> Wanting 'a run for cattle and to buy produce', he remained there until the Waikato War. He took wheat down the river to Opukeko, preferring 'going down in a fresh because of snags'. He had 'dealings' with Ngati Haua in 1855, and ate eels they caught.<sup>35</sup> According to a Ngati Haua rangatira, speaking in 1878, Nicholls was 'placed' on Te Tuatara, part of Waiharakeke East, by both Ngati Tawhaki and Ngati Haua.<sup>36</sup>

On 29 October 1858, Eliza Jones (later Stack), who was visiting Matamata with a party of Anglican missionaries, recorded meeting his eldest daughter, whom she knew as Charlotte, then aged 14:

We called on Mr Nicholls, who was the only English settler there, but he was away from home. He was married to a native woman and had several children. His daughter, a very nice looking girl with large bright eyes and pleasing expression did her best to entertain us but she was very nervous, not being accustomed to meeting Europeans. In the course of conversation with her I found that she had been at Mrs Kissling's school in Auckland.<sup>37</sup>

Later that day, when Charlotte visited Eliza, 'I asked her to spend the night with me as I thought she would be a pleasanter companion in my tent than old Miriam whose partiality for strong scented hair oil made close proximity to her rather trying. Charlotte was delighted to stay with me, and I found her a very nice-minded girl'.<sup>38</sup> When Eliza wanted solitude, 'I got Charlotte Nicholls to explain to them that I preferred being alone on Sunday as it gave him time to read my Book',<sup>39</sup> meaning the Bible. On Sunday, 'when the women gathered round me again I got a Maori Testament and read to them and to my surprise they understood every word. They asked Charlotte Nicholls to ask me to explain the passage I read, which, with her help, I did'.<sup>40</sup> When they left Matamata on the following day, 'poor Charlotte had a sad cry at our parting as her father would not let her accompany me to Auckland. He was very civil to me and gave many good reasons why it was not advisable for his daughter to leave home. He kindly lent me a side saddle as the one I had was very uncomfortable'.<sup>41</sup>

In 1860 he gave his occupation as a grazier living at Matamata.<sup>42</sup> He 'was the first man to bring cattle from Tauranga by the Wairere track, which was a difficult matter in those days owing to the stormy winds in the district (worse than a Te Aroha gale); and, having his house blown down, he left for Kikowhakarue, near Coromandel'.<sup>43</sup> This was probably after the Coromandel goldrush commenced in late 1861; in mid-1862 he applied for a publican's license 'for inland of Koputauahi on the sea side, near to the Diggings of that District, if arrangements can be made with Paul's people for that purpose'.<sup>44</sup> (Paora Te Putu and his people were reluctant to see Pakeha take their land and their gold.)<sup>45</sup> Nicholls did not receive a license, but at Kikowhakarue he 'built several schooners, which he sold to the Natives, one of the vessels he sold to the Matamata Natives for a block of land, which after some years he sold' to Josiah Clifton Firth;<sup>46</sup> it 'formed the nucleus' of Firth's Mamatata estate.<sup>47</sup> When he returned to Matamata is not known.

In 1871, Hori Timo of Ngati Rahiri recalled the Nicholls family living at Omaha, that hapu's pa at Te Aroha, before the Waikato War.<sup>48</sup> Mokena Hou<sup>49</sup> also recalled Nicholls' children having a kainga on the Aroha Block, 'but I turned them away' after threatening to burn down the house erected by Harete, his eldest daughter.<sup>50</sup> In July 1863, 'Mr Nicols, jun.,' left Piako for Auckland along with other Pakeha Maori because they feared a Maori attack.<sup>51</sup> An obituary stated that

He was obliged to leave just before the Waikato war, having great difficulty in getting his cattle to the Auckland market; the Natives stopped the Waikato road after the first lot of cattle were taken down – he had to take the second lot by Piako, passing through where Morrinsville now stands to where the Miranda Redoubt stood and then striking across the country for the Great South Road; they then closed the Piako road and the remainder he brought down by the west bank of the Waihou river, finally shipping them at Hikutaia for Auckland. He also bought great quantities of wheat from the Natives grown at Waiharakeke, Matamata, and Peria which was brought down the river in large canoes to the head of navigation for sailing vessels.<sup>52</sup>

During the war, his weatherboard house and store were destroyed and he lost two cows along with other property. He made two claims to the government for compensation, one for £294 12s, which he agreed to reduce to £212, and the other for £76 16s 6d, which was reduced to £20 6s before a reinvestigation recommended that nothing be paid.<sup>53</sup>

AFTER THE WAR

In 1864, Wirope Hoterene Taipari placed Nicholls on Rapana Maunganoa's land<sup>54</sup> behind the beach at Kauaeranga, part of the future Thames, with his son-in-law,<sup>55</sup> John Richard William Guilding.<sup>56</sup> The following year, as Taipari later explained, a lease of £7 per annum was agreed upon and Rapana and others 'were present when I pegged off Nicholls' piece'. He lived there 'till the opening of the goldfield'.<sup>57</sup> In 1865 he assisted Guilding and others to prospect for gold, but they did not find a payable goldfield.<sup>58</sup> When mining commenced in August 1867, Nicholls was described as 'one of the oldest residents in the Thames district', with 'a store close to the landing-place'.<sup>59</sup> This building, close to the later Shortland wharf, was quickly converted into the Duke of Edinburgh Hotel.<sup>60</sup> Almost immediately, he was severely fined for a breach of the Spirit Licensing Act, and another man became licensee.<sup>61</sup> He retained the building, which with its allotment was valued at £124 10s in 1869.<sup>62</sup>

Nicholls obtained miner's right no. 275, issued on 16 September 1867.<sup>63</sup> The following September, he was sued for 'breach of contract of agreement to purchase a working half-share in the Star of Onehunga' and was required to pay the plaintiff £89 ‘and £10 out of the first dividend declared by the shareholders’. When the plaintiff received the £89, he was to transfer this half-share to Nicholls.<sup>64</sup> He had shares in one company, and was sued in 1870 to force him to pay a call.<sup>65</sup> The following year he held one-sixth of the interests in a Karaka Creek claim.<sup>66</sup> In 1878 he was threatened with forfeiting his 40 shares in another company if a call remained unpaid.<sup>67</sup>

In 1866 he claimed a run at Matamata comprising the Te Uruhau block, estimated at 3,000 acres, on which he intended to run 200 sheep.<sup>68</sup> By at least March 1868 he had abandoned Thames to live at Huakaranu.<sup>69</sup> According to his younger son, after leaving Thames he lived on the Komata Block in Ohinemuri.<sup>70</sup> In late 1867, when Ngati Haua (in another account, Ngati Porou) were on their way to destroy Firth’s monument to Wiremu Tamihana, they considered shooting Nicholls,<sup>71</sup> but refrained.

In April 1870 he was possibly the William Nicholls who was assaulted in Thames in a dispute over a boat, for an Auckland, who had the same names,<sup>72</sup> also had difficulties over a vessel he owned.<sup>73</sup> The assaulted man told the court that he had gone ‘down on the beach at Grahamstown to seize the vessel Elizabeth, that belonged to him. He saw they were ready to go away’, and took another man with him ‘to take possession’. While he was standing on the shore, the accused ‘jumped into a boat, and threatened him if he touched the vessel. Complainant put his hand on the vessel, and defendant then seized the tiller and struck complainant on the back of the head. He did nothing to provoke the assault'. His attacker was fined £5.<sup>74</sup>

Nicholls travelled freely in Maori territory, in June 1870 returning from Ohinemuri and Te Aroha with news that Hauhau intended 'to make an attack on some one', possibly Maori, possibly Pakeha, 'shortly'.<sup>75</sup> His contact with Ngati Haua meant that on at least one occasion he tried to act as an intermediary with a potential buyer of one of their blocks of land.<sup>76</sup> On another recorded occasion, he assisted a rangatira writing an application about land.<sup>77</sup> 'After the war he was trading at Piako and Hauraki, finally settling down near Te Aroha', which had been 'a regular stopping place' when he took wheat down the river to market.<sup>78</sup> In 1876, Sir George Grey was angered by a claim by an Ohinemuri settler, Henry Alley,<sup>79</sup> that Nicholls had received money for helping to put blocks through the land court. 'I know for a fact he received £150 from a Native Land Commissioner to assist to put through the Hungahunga block', a figure Alley was told was £50 too high.<sup>80</sup> Hungahunga was upstream from Te Aroha, on the western side of the river and adjoining the Waiharakeke West block.<sup>81</sup>

Aroha and Paeroa. Early maps showed the Mangamutu Block adjoining the southern boundary of the Rae o Te Papa Block; another boundary was the river.<sup>83</sup> In 1893 Hoera Tareranui of Ngati Tamatera informed the land court that in 1868 he ‘placed Mr Nicholls on Mangamutu’.<sup>84</sup> Confusingly, at the 1877 hearing to determine the ownership of the Waitoki Block, Hoera stated that he had permitted Nicholls to live there only three years previously. His decision caused conflict, for Makareta, grandmother of Merea Wikiriwhi,<sup>85</sup> had peach trees on the land and she said to prevent the Pakehas getting them she would chop them up – She cut one tree down and W. Nicholls then took her axe away. No one ever objected to the house. After it was built my father and I went there and arranged with Nicholls to the rent he was to pay us. We leased the whole block to him for 10 years at £30 per annum.<sup>86</sup>

Ngati Rahiri objected, as Mokena Hou had already explained:

A Pakeha named Nicholls built a house on the land. We objected to his doing so because it was Tareranui who gave him leave to build the house. We threatened to burn it down but when we found that it had been built by order of Nicholls’ half caste daughter [Charlotte] we made no objection – the girls were related to us. They were descended from our Ancestor Rakiteuru on the mother’s side.<sup>87</sup>

Mokena considered that Nicholls should not pay anything to Hoera Tareranui.<sup>88</sup> After one and a half years, Nicholls abandoned the lease and asked Hoera ‘to refund the money he had paid for survey and for building his house’. James Mackay, on Hoera’s instructions, paid this money to Nicholls, deducting the rent owing.<sup>89</sup>

Through their mother, his children had a claim to the 450-acre Ruakaka Block at Te Aroha, which was accepted by the court in 1869.<sup>90</sup> Nicholls 'paid the whole of the expenses', but by December 1872 still had not received title.<sup>91</sup>

On their way to Te Aroha in May 1871, a party travelling upriver stopped at his Mangamutu farm late one afternoon. 'I think never did man appear to be more astonished than when I stepped on shore and asked him what place this might be. We were well treated with a good dinner, and stayed for the night'. The following day Nicholls' younger son, James Ponui, guided their canoe to Te Aroha.<sup>92</sup> In December the following year, a Thames party coming across the Rotokohu gorge, between Nicholls' farm and Paeroa, were impressed with the view:

To the southward the view of the Upper Thames and Te Aroha was obstructed by a rocky-faced spur from that mountain, called Te Rae o te Papa, that gives its name to the locality chosen by Mr Nicholls for his residence, which together with several small native settlements, could be seen down on the river bank, at a distance of about three miles from us. A very steep descent and a short gallop over level grassy and ferny country brought us to Nicholls' house.<sup>93</sup>

The party was 'most kindly and hospitably received by Mr Nicholls and his daughter' Susan.

Having informed her of our destination, up the Waihou Valley, no time was lost in preparing for us a mid-day meal, thus exemplifying that practical Christianity inculcated by St Paul, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers," which is worth a multitude of professions and sermons. In the meantime, our horses were tethered amidst good green feed, such as they had not enjoyed since we started.... Mr Nicholls has a nice place on the river bank, well-fenced, with an acre or two of wheat, and plenty of potatoes and vegetables.<sup>94</sup>

Once more his son James guided the party to Te Aroha.<sup>95</sup> Nine years later, a Pakeha travelling to Te Aroha wrote that ‘we, fortunately, had on board the steamer, a very clever Maori linguist, named Harete, a daughter of Mr Nicholls, one of the oldest settlers in the district, and thoroughly reliable’.<sup>96</sup>

Nicholls retained contact with the wider community. In March 1873, when a Good Templers Lodge was inaugurated in Thames, he was appointed ‘Left-hand Supporter’;<sup>97</sup> his membership indicated his opposition to the abuse of alcohol. Five years later, he was one of those calling a meeting at Paeroa to consider establishing an Ohinemuri County Council.<sup>98</sup> His only involvement in Ohinemuri mining was to be an owner, with mainly Maori partners, in one claim, probably near Owcharoa, in 1875.<sup>99</sup> Another example of his close association with Maori was that when accused of shooting game without a license in 1877, he claimed to have the approval of the Maori landowners; his argument was rejected and a nominal penalty was imposed.<sup>100</sup>

In November 1876, Nicholls and his children were granted a 100-acre allotment in the Parish of Te Puna,<sup>101</sup> near Tauranga, but there is no evidence of their living on it. In 1880 Nicholls had ‘a paddock’ in Paeroa.<sup>102</sup> The following May, he applied for a 50-acre Ohinemuri agricultural lease, which he later asked to be issued in the name of a son-in-law, Charles Dearle.<sup>103</sup> He was granted a timber license for an area near his land in late

THE TE AROHA GOLDFIELD

An 'old resident' of Te Aroha, seemingly Nicholls, was interviewed in 1880 about his gold explorations:

He spent nearly two years, off and on, in vigorous prospecting. He discovered several reefs and leaders, but none of them showed gold. He however found nice gold in pieces of brown quartz lying on the surface after he had burnt off the scrub, and on one occasion he brought down to Grahamstown a kit containing 22lb of nice specimens, which he caused to be crushed privately, and which gave a yield of 11oz 4dwt melted gold. The cake was sold at the Bank of New Zealand in Auckland, and fetched £3 12s per ounce, as it was of splendid quality. He informs us that all the gold he obtained at Te Aroha never went less than £3.... He says that although he failed to discover gold in any of the reefs, the late Sir Donald McLean visited the Aroha some years before his death, and was shown the most promising of the lodes by our informant. The Native Minister caused several pounds of the stone to be broken out, and taken to Wellington, where it was tested at the Government Laboratory, and yielded at the rate of 4oz to the ton. Our informant knows where the reef in question is situated, and intends to take it up as soon as the field is opened.<sup>106</sup>

Some details are undermined by the fact that McLean did not visit Te Aroha in the 1870s. His earlier prospecting prompted Nicholls to take out a miner's right on opening day.<sup>107</sup> In December 1880, he was an owner of two claims at Tui, and after one, the Tui, was forfeited, he was allotted one share in it.<sup>108</sup> A correspondent was informed 'on good authority' that the Catran brothers, Martin, Stephen, Thomas, and William,<sup>109</sup> who reputedly made a good find on a branch of the Tui Stream, 'were laid on to it by old Nicholls some 12 months ago'.<sup>110</sup> The brothers confirmed that Nicholls had told them of this gold-bearing lode and had showed it to them after the field opened.<sup>111</sup> In January, with others he prospected a short distance to the south of the Tui claim.<sup>112</sup> His interest was diverted to the new Waihi discovery, where he applied for a water race in early 1881,<sup>113</sup> but did not construct it. Shortly after the Waiorongomai field was discovered, Nicholls with his two sons and a Pakeha investor marked out two claims.<sup>114</sup> He acquired half of one share in the Hero in February 1882, which was converted in May into 400 scrip shares in the Hero Company.<sup>115</sup> That was the extent of his involvement in Te Aroha mining.

When a coroner's jury was selected to investigate the murder of Himiona Haira at Te Aroha, Nicholls was a member,<sup>116</sup> no doubt because of his close links with Maori.

DEATH

After living with his elder son for some years, Nicholls died in Paeroa in December 1900 of 'general debility', aged 82. He was noted as being the last but one 'of the paheka Maoris' of the district.<sup>117</sup> (The other would have been George Lipsey.)<sup>118</sup>

CHILDREN

All Nicholls' children apart from James Ponui and Susan have chapters to themselves because their lives or those of their marriage partners can be traced in detail.

JAMES PONUI NICHOLLS

In Thames, at an unknown date,<sup>119</sup> James Ponui Nicholls married Hera, or Sarah, Kiriwaitai, also known as Merea, under Maori custom. She was the daughter of Kohera Hone, of Ngati Tara, and of Ngahehu Pepene Kiriwaitai, otherwise Pepene Tipirihi, of Ngati Hako. Her brother was Kimokimo Pepene,<sup>120</sup> with whom she was charged, in December 1875, with damaging a canvas house belonging to a Pakeha settler. They were both then living at Waitoki; both were discharged after paying for the damage.<sup>121</sup>

James and Hera had three children: two girls, Rene Kiriwaitai, born in 1872, and Mere or Merea, born in 1876, and one son, Humapere, otherwise Humphrey, born in 1874.<sup>122</sup> According to his descendants, there was another daughter, Mikereana,<sup>123</sup> who must have died in childhood. Their births were not registered. His wife had died by September 1889, and along with his sister Alice Grey Dearle he was appointed a trustee for the land his children inherited from her.<sup>124</sup> James had acquired another 'wife' by November 1902, when the Te Aroha News referred to a half-caste man fighting a Maori woman at the races. 'Needless to say the unfortunate woman got the worst of it'.<sup>125</sup> At the subsequent court hearing, both James and Heki Nicholls, as she was named, were accused of threatening behaviour; after pleading guilty, they were fined 5s.<sup>126</sup>

James was living with his family in the early 1870s on the banks of the Waihou River. In December 1874, when the 'Fairy' was the first steamer to reach Te Aroha, James Mackay was at the bow watching for snags 'and young Nicholls, a half-caste, who lived some 8 or 9 miles up the river' from the junction with the Ohinemuri River 'undertook to steer'.<sup>127</sup> He first achieved public prominence in 1875 when he accused another part-Maori family of stealing his wife's horse.<sup>128</sup> He was then still living with his family at Waitoki.<sup>129</sup> In July 1877 he was mentioned in the press for being unwilling to lend a Maori money in a Paeroa bar.<sup>130</sup> A month later a baker sued him for £5 5s 5d.<sup>131</sup> One year later, when this debt remained unpaid and a judgment summons was taken out against him for £10 3s 5d, he explained his position:

He had no money to pay the bill, but he expected to have some soon. He expected to get work in a short time. In the meantime he should live on the produce of the soil. He and the persons who lived on the settlement claimed the land as their own, for the Government had put in a claim for it. He had a share in the Waiharakeke block. The debt he owed was for bread. He had paid the tailor and bootmaker for his clothing. An order was made that he would have to pay £2 a month, commencing on 1st August, and failing any payment, to undergo a month's imprisonment.<sup>132</sup>

This debt was paid, but two months later he was charged £7 5s 6d for board and lodging after staying in a hotel for almost nine weeks. An indication of his close association with Maori was that an interpreter was used in the hearing.<sup>133</sup> A judgment summons had to be issued to enforce payment.<sup>134</sup>

James was interested in goldmining, but only very lethargically, according to a correspondent writing in 1869:

A report reached here the other day from up country that a half-caste son of Mr Nicholls, a settler, has been tunnelling into the Aroha Mountain, and had arrived at the distance of 150 feet, when he struck gold, which report, I think, is very shaky, as I happen to know pretty well the working propensities of the young man. My idea is, that he would rather be performing on the Jew's-harp than working with the pick and shovel.<sup>135</sup>

James was briefly involved in the Te Aroha rush, obtaining a miner's right on opening day and shares in two claims in the following month;<sup>136</sup> there was no mention of the reported 150-foot tunnel driven in 1869. A correspondent visiting the United found that 'right in the centre' Nicholls, his brother-in-law Charles Dearle, and 'one or two others' had 'pegged out an area' and driven about six feet, provoking a dispute with the owners of the United.<sup>137</sup> This conflict was soon resolved, and any continued involvement in mining ended in the following March, when he fell from a horse and broke his collarbone.<sup>138</sup> In October and November 1881, with others he pegged out three claims at Waiorongomai, in one with his father and brother.<sup>139</sup> After this last involvement in mining he returned to farming

SUSAN TE WHAKAAWA CARTMAN

When Susan Nicholls provided lunch for unexpected visitors in 1872, she was described as ‘a handsome, refined, and well-educated young lady, whose appearance, though in deep morning, in these out-of-the-way parts, gave us a pleasant surprise’.<sup>143</sup> Her mourning clothes were because of the recent drowning of two nieces, daughters of John William Richard Guilding, and her own near drowning when attempting to rescue them.<sup>144</sup>

In 1877, she married Richard Hartley Cartman, son of William, an English clergyman who was a Doctor of Divinity and headmaster of Skipton Grammar School in Yorkshire.<sup>145</sup> Richard’s brother worked for the Imperial Maritime Customs in China.<sup>146</sup> After arriving in New Zealand in March 1862, he fought in the Waikato Militia and was under fire on several occasions.<sup>147</sup> He received two Crown Grants for his service, but wanted more.<sup>148</sup>

CONCLUSION

William Nicholls lived for most of his life as a Pakeha Maori, but not one who lazed around while his Maori relatives did all the work for him, as others were accused of doing.<sup>163</sup> Although not very active in local affairs, he was a respected member of the Pakeha community, and most of his children, whom he ensured were well educated, did well in life, notably his elder son.
